BECOME A BONIFACE

He Contemplates Opening Up a Big Cafe and Hotel in New York This Year.

NEW YORK, May 7 .- The announcement that Champion Jim Jeffries was going to retire from the boxing game within a year, was not a great surprise to the champion's intimate friends, to whom he made known his plans before he left for the Pacific coast. It is understood that Jeffries has been contemplating opening up a big cafe and hotel in New York. During his extended visit to the city the champion was approached by several wealthy friends, who offered to advance considerable money to start the scheme.

Jeffries has a longing to become a boniface, but he hesitates about going into the matter until he could give the business his personal attention. Jeffries realizes that within a year there will not be an opponent in sight for him to meet whereby he could add to his bank account to any great advantage. Putting some of his First Race-Four and one-half furlongs: savings into a good business proposition from which he could draw a regular inome, Jeffries thinks, would be better than to meet inferior fighters and get only a little money for his trouble. When Jeffries retires he will not leave the profession a bankrupt like many of his predecessors. The huge Californian has made modey fast. He has accumulated a small fortune in a very short time, and, although he has lived a life of ease, he has by no means squandered his money. Profiting by the experience of those great fighters that fell by the wayside, Jeffries learned that it was a wise scheme to lay something aside for a rainy day. With some of his savings he purchased land in
